Durwin Sharp, 53, is the main catalyst for the idea for the Houston-based Virtual Thinking Expedition Co., where he helps guide innovative boot camps. The pace of economic change is forcing and enabling people to innovate faster than ever before. And as more people are wrapped up to think, more organizations are giving workers a license to muck around with ideas. Smart companies understand that they need to give up a lot of control so they can uncover and support serious innovation. But unbridled creativity is not a complete business decision. Control, structure and results still matter, even if you're only as good as your last idea. So what? Change agents are redefining the balance between everyday management and creativity. How do you demonstrate the value of innovation? Translating out-there ideas into something that even skeptics can understand: results. The key is to stretch people's comfort level in a way that teases their minds enough to push them to think in a new space. Futurology Decoder Key Creativity is still messy. But companies that allow their white blood cells to eradicate creative inefficiency will not last. Successful organizations will be the ones that set aside resources to explore crazy questions: What idea would you be fired for? What idea would lead to your boss being fired? What idea seems impossible, but if it is implemented, will revolutionize your business? Because if they don't do it, their competitors will. Handout/Getty Images Entertainment Update, 4/9/15: Over EW, Will Ferrell says the project is being scrapped, we are deeply disappointed that our planned top secret project has been unveiled. Kristen and I decided it was in everyone's interest to abandon the project completely and we thank Lifetime and all the people who were willing to help us make this movie. But a statement from Lifetime via E! says the network still determines the fate of the film, so there's a chance the deadly adoption could still be on. Over the past year, Lifetime has decided to take a tongue-in-cheek approach to its image and make fun of itself with some blunt programming. It's an approach that may just turn out to be as horribly bad as the preaching drama network is known for, but Lifetime has managed to get some of the best comedians in the industry on board. First came the Grumpy Cat Christmas movie, which saw parks and recreation of Aubrey Plaza lending her voice to a moeey-looking kitten, and now The Hollywood Reporter says that Will Ferrell and Kristen Wiig are in charge for a secret Lifetime film parody called Deadly Adoption. According to the publication, the two-hour TV movie has already been filmed and debuts sometime in the beginning Summer. The fact that two of the world's biggest comedians have been able to make a Lifetime movie without any figuring out is a testament to life keep the project a secret. A THR source said the film sees Wiig and Ferrell play a successful couple who allow a young pregnant woman to come stay with them as they hope to adopt their child after she gives birth. Things then end up happening quickly (and campily) wrong, as the movie parodies the typical Lifetime movie format. Deadly adoption was made to mark the 25th anniversary of Lifetime doing what it does best by making over-the-top dramas about any domestic problems bothering people at the moment. Wiig and Ferrell have a history of parody television together. They worked on two parts of Funny or Die's Spoils miniseries event parody. Spoils of Babylon ridiculed several generations of dysfunctional family stories and earned Wiig an Emmy nomination for lead actress in a miniseries. The second installment, Spoils Before Death, is due to air on IFC this summer. In the parody, Ferrell plays an eccentric writer-turned-director who created the series, presenting and completing each episode. This Lifetime movie has ties to Ferrell's Funny or Die Company and may have something in common with the TV series Spoils. Funny or Die was founded by Ferrell and Adam McKay, who THR said also produce Deadly Adoption under their Gary Sanchez banner. The script comes from Andrew Steele, who wrote Spoiled Babylon. The publication notes that Ferrell is a longtime fan of The Lifetime Films and has wanted to make one for some time. A humor tack can be a good way for life to rehabilitate your image after a series of recent controversial biopics about deceased celebrities who drew anger from the families of these stars and fans. Grumpy Cat's Worst Christmas Ever functioned similarly to the deadly adoption, as the film ridiculed Lifetime, and was generally camp and funny. Landing Aubrey Plaza to make a voice and promote the film was also a win for the network as the rise of the young comedian was in the midst of much attention for the soon-to-end Parks and Rec, as well as her own fast-growing film career. The film received terrible reviews, with 35 Metascore on Metacritic, but not a bad-looking point? The plan to add some tongue-in-cheek humor involving some of the best comedians in the business seems solid to put that bad press out of these biopics out of people's minds, and celebrate the network's 25th anniversary. One of the problems with this plan may be the network audience. The spoils series runs at IFC, a network where viewers are used to weird, silly shows. A typical Lifetime audience may be confused by a parody film starring Igo and Ferrell, while fans of these comedians may not know to go to Lifetime to watch their latest project. It seems kind of like Lifetime is trying to become well-liked purposefully committing comedic pratfalls that, when done by accident, made people laugh at it. This tactic never works in real life, but see if it's on TV. Follow Jacqueline on Twitter @Jacqui_WSCS More from Entertainment Cheat Sheet: Last Monday, after waking up at noon, I made my way to Handlebar Coffee Roasters here in Santa Barbara. There, parked in a primo handicap spot near the front door, was a '95 or so BMW 850CSI. A V-12 sleek shark among the blunt crossovers, it was juicy, lustful, and somewhat crazy. This is a car that I drove back to the same day and remember with pointed passion. So as I poked fun at the do, I shot some photos with my iPhone SE-official iPhone of old writers who refuse to join AARP and posted them on Facebook. One car to have, if you only have one car forever, I posted. This unleashed all kinds of comments from many of my 3323 friends. And the next day I posted again to keep the conversation going. What kind of car do you have to have if you only have one car forever? I added. My idea was to take everything as a result of 195 comments and turn them into a column. And that's what you're reading now. I've been writing about cars for almost 30 years. So many of my friends are also writers or people in the automotive business. Keep that in mind. There is not a single machine that everyone would like to leave forever. What's interesting is how people differ around the reasons for keeping that around forever. They fall into general categories. But there is one car that stands out among them all. Hint: It's not 850CSI.Sentimentalists My '92 Mustang GT, which I still have, that I bought a new one in college, writes Wu Nguyen. My children are now 17, 15 and 10 years old. They call the Mustang their big brother. And after all these years its appearance and buzz still get thumbs up every time I take it. This is my car forever. Ford has made many '92 Mustangs, and none of them are really practical cars. Many people have raced them, but there are faster racing cars. And well, they were built like Fords. But none of this matters to Nguyen because he has one and he has a history with it. That's enough. John Bachtel was my boss at Car Craft in the early '90s. My 1968 Camaro SS 350 four speed. I bought a new one when I got back from Vietnam. Still my favorite after all these years and all the cars that I tested during my career. Bachtel bleeds nuts and bolts, but the first new car since returning from Vietnam is a goat test room. Already owning it, explained Tim Esterdahl, a freelance writer summarizing the sentimental case of his well-beaten '62 Chevrolet pickup. I keep this one forever. Kids get it when I'm six feet under. Sentimentalists want communication more than reason. My dad had a 1989 911 coupe, the last car he bought before he died, writes Bob Chapman. machine in which I took him for a walk in Texas Hill Country when he was sick . . . the car that is in my garage. RationalistsPractice choice for practical reasons. Jeep Wrangler Unlimited, Frank Williams definitely chose. Keeps three friends and a load; Almost Almost Personalized Parts are widely available. It makes sense, but also a few drained passions. And personalized is a word of dubious origin. Depends on the person, - concludes Dominic Infante. For a non-sports car man, Subaru Outback. It goes out on without road, is comfortable, safe, suitable for a ton of cargo and will last forever. Still looks good outside the restaurant. For a human sports car, any variant of the Porsche 911, for practicality, performance and funkiness. Yes, Infante is a down-to-back Subaru PR, but his professional bias does not detract from the power of his logic. And many other respondents have come up with different Subaru products as a single vehicle to accompany them throughout their lives. And the Porsche 911 is the only sports car that is mentioned as the logical meaning of owning forever. Volvo, Mercedes-AMG and Audi wagons were also mentioned. A particularly impressive Audi RS6, which I find cursed is an almost impossible proposition with which to argue. But I'm sure the current RS6 will someday fade into a new one, and I'll be loathing after that one more. Plus Brian Scotto wants one, and I'm already resenting his success at Hunigan. Trucks, from old F-100 pickup trucks to current predators, were also frequently mentioned. Ben Stewart skewered me not to mention my two Toyota Tundras. We trucks you always take pictures, lash out at the story, and after loving comments on Facebook about, he wrote, alluding to my hypocrisy. You don't love us forever? Sucking eggs, mate. Finally, proving that she's a complete mom, Erin Richs, Edmunds.com, effectively proposed the Mazda 5. I forgot they even did it, but it's only been three years since they stopped. FantasistsThese are people who dream big and in great detail. My choice is to: Marina Blue '67 Corvette coupe with L79 350-hp 327 and Muncie four speed, writes Miles Cook, who also worked at Car Craft and graduated from the same high school I did. Swap Tremec TKO five-speed into it, add a set of 16-inch rally wheels, and then drive and enjoy. Cook dreams in spec sheets. There really is only one car that has been mentioned for all three reasons. The original 1920s WO Bentley, argues Andrew Comrie-Pickard. Can take four people and luggage from Beijing to Paris, be repaired with fire and anvil in Kashmir, and still take the number one stall at the Ritz. I'm with the spirit of Comrie-Picard adventure, but I want an A/C and a power box on everything I keep forever. And I stay away from Kashmir.Karl Brower, whose career peaked as an editorial assistant in Hot Rod, argues that the Dodge Challenger SRT Demon is the perfect 800-hp family car. His argument is that this practical everyday machine is long and extensive. It is also, for my time, utterly unconvincing. Mike Allen, who wrote for Popular Mechanics, hit the fantasist with a sweet spot with Post. Porsche 911 Turbo Tiptronic. Stupid quick, comfortable in long trips, happy chugging together in the Lincoln Tunnel traffic. Car Car Keep ForeverThose had three common categories of reasoning, and there really is only one car that has been mentioned for all three reasons. This is, of course, a Porsche 911. Sorry, 850CSI, I was wrong. I don't know anyone, not even the most muscular hole or British car loyalist who doesn't look at 911 at least from time to time and think: I could drive this thing forever. The early 911s are built as tanks, easy to operate, and, even nearly 60 years later, are still some of the most useful cars to drive. Choose your year: This one is a 1993 Porsche 911. Go through all the permutations of this Porsche, 964, 993, 996, 997, 991, and no matter what's new and they're all staggeringly appealing. The new 911s will require rocket scientists using specialized supercomputers to keep them working well, but I get the feeling that the costs will be worth it. So I pronounce probably to the surprise of almost no one that one consensus car to drive and store forever is a Porsche 911.
